Ultimately a very large amount of the metal would be required, more than sufficient probably to neutralise the demonstisation of silver by Germany; but whereas the latter was accomplished at once the absorption of silver by China would be gradual, and its effects therefore less striking. It needs no demoustration, however, to show that to supply a silver coinage for a population of three wards relieving the glut in the market and the purpose of laying tramways in Henolulu. causing an ap reciation of the metal as measured by its gold value. favour of progress. But supposing the Government were willing to establish a mint and enforce an uniform currency for the whole empire the question remains whether the time has yet arrived when they could be trusted to carry out an undertaking of so momentous a nature. The venality of the officials, high and low, and the neglect of the Government to enforce its decrees, must be recognised as formidable barriers in the able on application to the Hurbour Master. way of the inauguration of this necessary enterprise. The establishment of the tele-

much more directly under the control the Central Government that, if the latter were disposed to be honest itself, it could irregularities by officials in distant provinces such as Yuunan or Kweichow much more readily than it could have done even eight years ago. But even giving the Government of the currency of a country is a matter requiring scientific knowledge with the wassession of which the Chinese mandaring cannot be credited. There is also the possibility that if the Government began actively to in: terfere with the currency, they might coneider it convenient to issue paper money, an operation which would probably bring about worse evils than those of the present system. Allkinds of dangers loom up in connection with a subject of such magnitude as the establishment of a currency for a vast empire like China, but the necessity for a currency is one the supplying of which cannot be deferred for any very lengthened period. If China undertakes the task herself she will doubtless have to pay for her experience; but there is no reason why she should not fin the end succeed as well as Japan has done.
